Many scripture scholars don't think Jesus actually composed the story of Lazarus and the rich man; they think he most likely used a well-known folktale from another culture to make his point. The reason they think this is because the text uses the word 'Hades' for hell. Hades was a word from Greek mythology and was not part of the Jewish language. So, this passage is not Jesus offering a theology of the afterlife; rather, he is emphasizing to the Pharisees, who had just been labelled as lovers of money, that their love of money and their disregard for the poor could be their downfall.

The divide between the rich man and Lazarus in the afterlife was not created by God but by the rich man himself. Even though he found himself in a place of torment, he still treated Lazarus like a servant, designating Lazarus to bring him a drop of water. Note that he didn't ask Abraham to bring it. The rich man still didn't get it. He really didn't understand what was keeping him separated from the Kingdom.

We all know the story of the Prodigal Son. He had an epiphany and was totally welcomed back into his Father's home. Compare that to the rich man. The rich man had no great epiphanies about his mistakes and no sense of what he should be repenting for. If he had, the divide would have immediately vanished. The rich man chose the separation; he chose to keep the divide between himself and Lazarus. In the story, Abraham very rightly discerns that even if someone came back from the dead, the rich man's brothers would not stop loving money and would not stop despising the poor.

Jesus wasn't warning that love of wealth will send you straight to hell. He was warning that once wealth becomes a top priority, you are likely to create and staunchly maintain a divide between yourself and the Anawim of God and death is not likely to change that chosen status.

The love of money is a chosen hell.
